OCTOBER 14, 2021

MERICS
Europe China 360°
THOMAS DES GARETS GEDDES, FRANCESCA GHIRETTI,
JACOB MARDELL, GRZEGORZ STEC

CONTENTS

ANALYSIS ........................................................................................................................................2
EU-Western Balkans summit held amid concerns over growing Chinese influence ............... 2
China debates: China confident about Sino-German relations despite bumpy road ahead.... 3
BUZZWORD OF THE WEEK ..............................................................................................................6
REVIEW ...........................................................................................................................................7
A marginal role for China at the European leaders’ dinner ......................................................... 7
Czech elections may mark shift in China policy ........................................................................... 8
SHORT TAKES ..................................................................................................................................9
EU leaders gathered in Slovenia on Wednesday for the first EU-Western Balkans summit held in person since 2018. The EU has started paying close attention to the influence of Beijing in the Western Balkans. Brussels is concerned that the rollout of China’s Belt and Road Initiative in the region might negatively affect EU integration by impacting necessary progress on environment standards, corruption and financial stability. European leaders share the sense that the EU may be losing geopolitical ground to China.

China featured large in an informal dinner held on the eve of the summit to “discuss the EU’s role in the world.” In his conclusions following the meeting, EU President Charles Michel stated that the EU must pursue its own interests on the global stage “in particular vis-à-vis China.”

The perception that the EU is losing out in the Western Balkans was reinforced by the leader of the largest country in the region, Serbian President Aleksander Vucic. Speaking during the height of the pandemic in Europe as medical equipment arrived from China, Vucic declared European solidarity a “fairytale” and claimed that only the Chinese could help. Of course, Vucic’s words are partly political theatre – he is adept at flaunting ties with China in order to leverage concessions from the EU. In October last year, Vucic asked the EU to fund a railway line linking Belgrade to the Southern city of Nis, adding that he would turn to China if Brussels declined the grant. As of April this year, Brussels committed to provide at least EUR 600 million for the project.

Anxiety about China’s growing influence in the Western Balkans is implicit in parts of the summit declaration. For instance, the passage on “disinformation” from “third-state actors” mirrors an EU External Action Service report on Russian and Chinese propaganda in the region around Covid-19 vaccines.

The declaration’s third paragraph opens with a statement that the EU is “by far the region’s closest partner, main investor and principal donor, and continues to insist that “the unprecedented scale and range of this support must be fully recognized and conveyed” by Western Balkan countries in public communications. The EU, however, has noticed that while it provides much more assistance than China to the region, Vucic is more public in his gratitude towards Beijing; it’s the Chinese, not the EU flag that Vucic has been filmed kissing.

The EU has deepened its financial commitment to the region, including on the hard infrastructure that China is famous for funding. EU leaders at the summit were keen to emphasize the EUR 30 billion investment plan outlined last October, which includes EUR 9 billion of grants over a seven-year period.

As the EU recognizes, however, China is not popular because it provides more money. In Serbia, for example, China is popular partly because it suits the domestic and international political maneuvering of Vucic and partly because anti-Western narratives and dissatisfaction with the European integration process provide fertile ground for pro-Chinese sentiment.

In the summit declaration EU leaders stressed their “commitment to the enlargement process.” This is a step beyond the usual formulation of “support for the European perspective of the Western Balkans,” but there was no adoption of Slovenia’s recommendation to set a date for accession.

The EU’s new financial commitments are significant, but as Brussels recognizes – it has always contributed more than China in reality. In failing to set a date for accession, the EU has missed an opportunity to challenge Beijing’s appeal by tackling Western Balkans dissatisfaction with the integration process.

Read more:
- Bertelsmann Stiftung: China’s economic footprint in the Western Balkans
- ECFR: Decade of patience: How China became a power in the Western Balkans
- EU Council: EU-Western Balkans summit, Brdo pri Kranju, Slovenia, 6 October 2021

China debates: China confident about Sino-German relations despite bumpy road ahead

Merkel’s popularity in China is high. On Wednesday, Xi Jinping even awarded her the honorary title of “old friend” of the Chinese people. She is often described as a “pragmatic” leader who has prioritized cooperation with Beijing and led her country to become Europe’s strongest economy. “She will be missed and remembered,” concluded one recent article by Guancha Syndicate. With her sixteen-year spell as chancellor now ending, analysts in China are predicting what may lie ahead. Regardless of which parties form the new coalition government, most Chinese experts anticipate growing tensions with Berlin, in the short term at least. In the face of such adversity, they recommend patience and restraint.

A weaker CDU and SPD is bad news for Sino-German relations

Beijing wants a strong and stable Germany and has been worrying about the state of German politics for some time. As Li Chao, an academic at the influential China Institutes of Contemporary International Relations (CICIR), remarked last year, Germany has been experiencing “severe domestic political fragmentation” in recent years which has weakened “the big parties.” Most analysts view both the CDU/CSU alliance and the SPD as more or less in line with Merkel’s “pragmatic” approach to Sino-German relations. The key variable for them has always been the extent to which “the smaller parties” would influence the next German government. They will be the real troublemakers, they believe.

Another worry for China is the power vacuum left by Merkel’s imminent departure. Chinese experts see both the CDU and the SPD as being undermined by intra-party conflicts. “The two [current] SPD leaders are more left-leaning while Scholz is more to the right [...] internal contradictions will gradually emerge,” writes Zheng Chunrong, Director of the German Studies Centre at Tongji University. He and others worry that Scholz or Laschet might not have enough Merkel-like authority to keep differing coalition voices in line with future government policies. Therefore, they expect a certain amount of volatility in Berlin’s initial signaling to Beijing.
German elections and the future of Sino-German relations
Selected quotes by Chinese experts

Sun Keqin  (孙洁勤)
Distinguished Professor, School of International Relations, Shanxi University

“In the future, US pressure on Berlin’s China policy will continue to increase. China-sceptic forces within Germany will continue to stir up trouble, and political changes may take place there [...] German policy towards China will be unstable, repetitive and full of twists and turns.”

Hou Guanhua  (侯冠华)
PhD candidate, Fudan University

“Whoever succeeds Merkel will lack substantial experience in dealing with China. The next chancellor might begin his/her term with some wavering of policy towards China. The Green Party [...] might also constrain the German government’s pragmatic China policy if they come to power.”

Ma Shuang  (马璐)
Lecturer at the School of Politics and Administration, Tianjin Normal University

“To avoid the EU fully aligning with the US, thereby increasing the pressure of strategic competition faced by the PRC, China needs to take a rational view towards the EU’s multi-level and issue-based approach to its engagement with China. It should also prevent the spread and escalation of ideological differences between China and the EU.”

Wang Shuo  (王朔)
Professor at the School of International Relations, Beijing Foreign Studies University

“The new coalition government will probably be moderately tough on China, with more emphasis on competition with China and concerns about its rise [...] the US will continue to embroil Europe in being tough on China, and the next German chancellor will probably have even less courage and clout to resist pressure from the US.”

Li Chao  (李超)
Associate Research Professor at the Institute of European Studies, CCIR

“Even if Europe becomes increasingly egoistic towards China, China should show the tolerance worthy of a great power and persist in looking at China-EU relations rationally. Only then will the relationship be able to develop in a positive way.”

Zheng Chunrong  (郑春荣)
Director of the German Studies Centre, Tongji University

“In the post-Merkel era, Germany’s overall tone towards China is likely to get tougher. This will include protectionist measures against China, a greater desire to strengthen coordination with the US on specific issues and the importance of values which is clearly on the rise. There will also be even more emphasis on Europe taking a unified stance towards China.”

Source: MERICS
Beijing should counteract the US’s influence on Berlin

The power shift might also mean more scope for the United States to influence Germany’s China policy, some say. Although most Chinese analysts regard Germany as Washington’s closest ally in post-Brexit EU, opinions vary on just how much sway Washington still has over Berlin. As usual, there are those who lay most of the blame on the US for Germany’s so-called "anti-China" moves, while others highlight the deepening distrust in transatlantic relations and the EU's emphasis on strategic autonomy. Nevertheless, Chinese experts’ view is that Beijing should expect greater policy coordination and "common language" between Germany and the United States when it comes to China.

Policy recommendations for Beijing

Despite such uncertainties, most analysts in China express confidence in the mid-to-long-term prospects for Sino-German relations. Some insist on the so-called traditional aspects of German politics characterized by consensus building at home and a low profile abroad. They point to Germany’s dependence on the Chinese market and its need for economic growth. Beijing should explore new ways of deepening its trade and investment ties with Berlin and Brussels, they suggest. Other areas of cooperation such as the environment, global health or the strengthening of multilateral institutions are often cited as further vectors of trust-building.

Overall, the main message from China seems to be that Germany, and by extension the EU, are too important right now for Beijing to alienate. China should therefore find ways of preventing the Franco-German tandem in particular from moving closer to the US. Beijing should fight back when its core interests are at stake, but otherwise act with restraint and equanimity when it can. Whether President Xi will follow such advice, is of course another matter.

Read more:

- Academic article by Sun Keqin and Hou Guanhua [CN]: The American factor in Germany’s China policy (Quote 1)
- Presentation transcript by Li Chao [CN]: Some thoughts on the current and next stage of Sino-German relations (Quote 2)
- Academic article by Ma Shuang [CN]: From Germany's Huawei 5G policy to the transformation of China-EU economic and trade relations (Quote 3)
- Interview with Zheng Chunrong [CN]: Uncertainty grows in Sino-German relations as German election results are inconclusive (Quote 4)
- Speech by Wang Shuo (abridged version) at the 2021 annual meeting of the China-Europe society [CN]: Political Changes in Europe and Sino-EU Relations (Quote 5)
- Guancha Syndicate opinion piece by Wu Huiping [CN]: Who should I call now if I want to talk about European affairs? (Quote 6)
According to a survey conducted by Good Judgement Inc in cooperation with MERICS, earlier this year a majority of forecasters believed that the CAI would still go through after January 2022, whereas now, the favorable answer is a hard "no." After the European Parliament symbolically decided to freeze the ratification process in May, it became evident that CAI was de-facto dead. At least until China lifts the sanctions imposed last Spring against European actors. But even then, any political will to ratify the agreement may still be lacking.

Exhibit 2

Good Judgement Inc is a consulting company that uses an international team of highly accurate Superforecaster® professionals to provide forecasts to private companies, major organizations, and government agencies. More information is available at:

www.goodjudgment.com
A marginal role for China at the European leaders’ dinner

The Slovenian presidency invited European leaders to an informal dinner on October 5, to discuss European China policy. Recent global geopolitical events, however, took precedence over discussing China policy.

What you need to know:

- Change of priorities: The withdrawal from Afghanistan and the birth of the AUKUS partnership between the US, UK and Australia shifted European leaders’ priorities away from China.
- 27+1: China did feature in the informal discussions, as European leaders revisited the idea of hosting a 27+1 summit. The format aims to act as a pan-EU platform to engage with China and thereby weaken bilateral and “mini-lateral” arrangements. At this stage however, it’s too early to tell whether the summit will take place.
- China is a competitor: Many outlets reported on the wording by Council President Charles Michel who chose to name China a competitor above all else in his closing remarks at the dinner. The 2019 Strategic Outlook famously defined China as a partner, a competitor and a systemic rival. HR/VP Josep Borrell, on the other hand, left the order in his blogpost unchanged: “partner, competitor, rival.”

Quick take: It comes as no surprise that the European leaders amended the agenda to address more pressing issues. Nonetheless, leaders missed an occasion to foster momentum for a more concrete, and hopefully, operational, China policy. After the informal summit, High Representative Josep Borrell stressed how important it is for the EU to be proactive and not simply react to events. In the meantime, policymakers are waiting to see where the “Strategic Compass” will point to. As things stand, however, without any serious strategizing from Brussels, pressing events are likely to continue hijacking the European agenda.

Read more:

- European External Action Service: Europe cannot afford to be a bystander in the world. We need a “strategic compass”
- Politico China Direct: Zurich and/or Rome - EU hardens tone - Live from Lithuania
- The Clingendael: The EU’s Strategic Compass for security and defence
Czech elections may mark shift in China policy

Czechs voted in dramatic elections last week that will likely result in a change of government with Prime Minister Andrej Babiš losing his office. Depending on who forms the new government, the country's position on China may be set to change.

What you need to know:

■ Dramatis personae: As prominent Czech actors diverge on China issues, the country's China policy appears volatile. President Miloš Zeman remains a strong supporter of engagement with China with questionable past connections, for example to the infamous CEFC chairman Ye Jianming. Prime Minister Babiš has favored a pragmatic, but indifferent approach given the limited benefits for the Czech economy. Key opposition figures, such as Senate President Miloš Vystrčil and Prague Mayor Zdeněk Hřib, have shown pro-Taiwanese sentiment.

■ Election results: While Babiš’ party, narrowly secured the highest number of seats, it lost the popular vote to center-right coalition SPOLU. The government formation is further complicated by the President’s admission to intensive care. Given the uncertainties, it may take months to form. A likely scenario is a SPOLU-party-led coalition with smaller opposition parties.

■ China impact: Contrary to past elections, China did not play a significant role in the campaign. But the new government is expected to align its foreign policy closely with the EU and the United States. This would set it at odds with President Zeman championing engagement with Russia and China.

Quick take: The shift in Czech politics comes ahead of the country's EU presidency scheduled for the second half of 2022. The Czech Presidency could become a counterbalance to the French agenda of strategic autonomy, depending on how sympathetic the new Czech government will be towards the US - including on China. Still, Prague may continue to send sympathetic gestures to Beijing through President Zeman, who is set to remain in power until 2023 provided his health allows.

Read more:

■ CHOICE: As Czechs Head to the Polls, China Remains on the Margins
■ Euronews: Six takeaways from the Czech Republic's historic election
■ CHOICE: Twitter thread on Chinese media reactions to the elections
SHORT TAKES

EU CO President Michel expected to speak with China’s President Xi on Friday

The call may be an attempt to stabilize the EU-China relations and an opportunity to display unity, as Michel will present a position agreed by EU27 in Slovenia.

- SCMP: [Xi Jinping plans call with EU’s Charles Michel, as Brussels looks to steady ship on China](https://www.scmp.com/news/asia/africa/article/3004529/xi-jinping-plans-call-eus-charles-michel-as-brussels-looks-

EU-China High Level Climate Dialogue joint communiqué released

The statement, released on October 10 comes two weeks after the dialogue took place and provides a general outline of prospective EU-China climate cooperation.

Huawei appeals its 5G ban in Sweden to the Court of Justice of the EU

Sweden’s administrative court upheld a ban on Huawei’s 5G equipment in June. Now, the Huawei appeal could have further implications for other member states.

- Politico: Huawei seeks EU court involvement in Swedish ban

Remote takeover vulnerability found in China’s Hikvision cameras

Widely used across Europe, Hikvision’s equipment has caused controversy over its data practices and their involvement in the detention of Uighurs in Xinjiang. The company released an update to fix the vulnerability.

- Politico: China’s cameras face fresh scrutiny in Europe

EU Commission re-imposes anti-dumping duties on wire rod from China

One justification for anti-dumping duties is the fact that SOEs have party members in their management or on the board of directors, which could have implications for other EU-China trade disputes.

---

MERICS | Mercator Institute for China Studies